Mathematical Linguistics

Mathematical linguistics involves the mathematical treatment of language to compare existing languages and mathematical structures in natural language processing. The field of formal linguistics is a theoretical study of language. Here the goal is to use your knowledge of linguistics being discussed, coming from that the group has common knowledge (formal linguistics).

The experimental study study where often takes a long time to complete. The present work represents the first in a long-standing effort to determine what factors are most likely to predict a person's health status, where these factors can be found from the extensive amount of historical and emerging scientific and public health information available. The authors discuss the need for a tool to help understand a number of factors, making data aggregation in the database collecting the results. This is a first step towards a better understanding of the factors influencing health status. Journal of Health Services Research, 2004, 9(4), 400-410.
