

teachers of writing (Dysthe, 2001: 1). Effective writing, therefore, has to go through a series of stages, until a final, meaningful product, is produced. Tyler (1985), Collins and Kesson (2001), and Hodge (1983) agree that writing should go through processes of pre-writing (such as brainstorming), drafting, revising and proofreading. We find the latter two stages very important as they, among other things, ensure a fluent, linguistically competent piece of writing. In light of this, the researchers were interested in unearthing whether GZU first year students regard writing as a process or as a product, the latter view which is eschewed by Munan for resulting in shoddy pieces of writing. A view of writing (an aspect of literacy) as a set of generalizable skills has been the dominant view in the last century (Dysthe, 2001) and is described by Street (2003) as an autonomous model of literacy, where writing skills are seen as neutral and universal, something akin to Paulo Freire's 'banking' model of education. Dysthe (2001) refers to this view as the study skills orientation to the teaching of writing. It is this orientation that informs the teaching of academic writing at GZU and other universities in Zimbabwe. In conceptualizing writing in terms of these discrete skills, Palmer in Matthews et al. (1995: 71) reminds us that writing is a special skill that does not spring naturally from an ability to speak a language. Palmer goes on to divide writing skills into graphical/visual, grammatical, expressive/stylistic, rhetorical and organizational skills.

Graphical/visual skills include the ability to spell words correctly, and Hilton and Hyder (1992) advise writers that knowledge of possible and probable spelling patterns is enhanced by sensible use of a dictionary. White (1996) also acknowledges the importance of the spelling skill in writing and asserts that steady practice will make you a better speller.

Also, included under graphical skills is the ability to punctuate one's written discourse correctly. In affirming the significance of punctuation in writing, Hardaway and Hardaway (1979: 47) pose the following pertinent questions to writers:

- Have you capitalized the beginnings of your sentences?
- Do you have question marks where they are necessary?
- Are any of your sentences run-ons or comma splices?
- Could you clarify the writing by using a semi-colon to join two independent clauses or a dash to separate a thought?

Format is also a visual skill and it includes such aspects as the layout of a letter, report, memorandum and other kinds of writing. Expressive or stylistic skills, according to Palmer in Matthews et al. (1995) referred to a writer's ability to express precise meanings in a variety of styles or registers, selected appropriate vocabulary, sentence patterns, and structures.

Rhetorical skills entail the writer's use of cohesive devices or linking devices or the ties, which make a piece of writing, 'hang together'. These include conjunctions, which Halliday and Hasan (1976) put into four categories, viz. additive, adversative, causal, and temporal. McCarter (1991) calls these devices connectives and groups them into those which show continuity (moreover, furthermore, in addition to); those which signal change of direction or focus (however, nevertheless, conversely, on the contrary, despite, in spite of, though); those signaling cause/effect (consequently, therefore, because); and the ones which showed that the writer is concluding (therefore, finally, hence, thus, lastly). White (1996) emphasizes the importance of organization and development in writing.

Organizational skills concern themselves with how information is organized into paragraphs and texts by sequencing ideas, rejecting irrelevant information and summarizing relevant points (Palmer in Matthews et al., 1995).

Thus, this study was interested in analyzing students' essays with focus on graphical, grammatical, rhetorical, organizational skills and others. From an academic socialization orientation, writing is seen as a facet aspect of learning to be a member of the discourse society of a particular discipline (Dysthe, 2001). This view of writing eschews any teaching of writing, arguing that as students study, they spontaneously picked up writing, which is, learning to write by osmosis. Finally, from an academic literacies point of view, writing is seen as a complex, developing accomplishment which is closely tied to the character of each discipline and the knowledge claims made by each discipline (Dysthe, 2001).

Not only does writing vary from subject to subject, but it is also influenced by students' literary contexts outside of school, as well as their personal, social and cultural experiences (Short and Cloud, 2008). Apparently, this is the same view, which Street (2003) shares in his ideological model of literacy, in which literacy is seen as being imbedded in social practices and is, therefore, contextual and situated.

New London Group (1996) also shares the same view. In view of this, the study will also briefly discuss students' writing from academic socialization, academic literacy, and ideological model perspective.

To sum up, writing could best be conceptualized by differentiating it from speech, by viewing it as a process rather than a product, by regarding it as a set of skills, by viewing it as an aspect of academic socialization, and, finally, by regarding it as a facet of academic literacy.

METHODOLOGY

The study was carried out over two semesters. Students of two different makes, one beginning March, 2010 and another beginning August, 2010 from all the four faculties in the university, participated in the study.

Fifteen lecturers selected from all the four faculties also participated.
