Read

Read this section from a chapter in a book about literary history. It describes two points of view about the authorship of William Shakespeare's plays.

Could Shakespeare Have Written Shakespeare's Plays?

Literary detectives have uncovered many facts about William Shakespeare. Still, the most important question of all remains: Did he really write the Shakespeare plays?

- 1 Sir Francis Bacon, Christopher Marlowe, the Earl of Southampton (Shakespeare's patron), and even Queen Elizabeth herself have at times been suspected of writing them. The sheer volume of Shakespeare's work—37 plays, 154 sonnets, 2 other poems, and an elegy—has led to suggestions that "William Shakespeare" was actually several people, not one.

OXFORD VS. STRATFORD

- The strongest current debate is between groups known as the Oxfordians and the Stratfordians. Oxfordians say that Edward de Vere, the 17th Earl of Oxford, wrote the plays under the pen name¹ William Shakespeare. Stratfordians, on the other hand, say that the works were all written by William Shakespeare, an actor known to have been born at Stratford in 1564. The challenge for both sides is to produce solid evidence. So far, neither side come up with much.

THE OXFORDIANS' CASE

- Oxfordians say the actor Shakespeare was poorly educated to have been the author of plays. He was the son of a tradesman, and is no record that he had any schooling. There is no evidence that he ever traveled outside southern England. He was just an actor and occasional real-estate investor. His will² mentions no writings, and there is no evidence he ever owned a book. A background like could not have been adequate for writing brilliant plays. The life of Edward de Vere, on the other hand, was more than adequate. Education was the best money could buy. He was very familiar with England's noble families. He traveled to many of the locations important in Shakespeare's plays, including France, Scotland, and Italy.
