✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

The thesis explored the representation of power and sexuality in Oscar Wilde's play "A Woman of No Importance". The analysis was conducted taking into account the ideas prevailing in British and American society. The research was performed in order to establish how women's power was manifested in a patriarchal society. At the same time, it was essential to demonstrate how the female question changed in the main characters' minds and whether feminist theory could be applied to the women characters in the play. Moreover, the dissertation reveals the issues of inequality and double standards that existed in upper-class society.

Introduction

At the turn of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, the women's issue was perhaps one of the most debated issues in British and American society. This is not surprising: the status of women was constantly improving in legislative terms, new spheres of activity and professions where women's work were created, and feminist movements were being born. The "women's issue" at this time was also actively discussed in literary works. In an age when society began to fight for women's rights, when they started to enter the educational system, the professional world, and politics, Oscar Wilde raises the question of women's influence.

He believes that women's influence over men is so strong that they need not fight for their rights. Everything the ladies aspire to can be achieved without changing the law. This is because they have "a hidden magical power" (he means sexuality) by which they bend men's passion "to a favorable opinion of her" (Wilde page no. 32). In the play, Wilde reflects the idea not just of women's influence but of their power. Wilde notes the superiority of women's irrational power over that given by the rational world. He is not interested in the typology of power, in modern terms, whether it is manipulation, contagion or imitation, but in the fact of women's power itself (Abdulrazzaq and Abbas
