

The AGES Model for Learning

Attention

Attention is key for learning, but we tend to only pay attention for about 20 minutes before needing a refresher. We also remember less and perform worse when multitasking, so a single focus is critical.

Tip: Build attention shifts every 20 minutes (e.g., changing speakers or chunking lessons into chapters) and remove all distractions to avoid multitasking.

Generation

Creating connections between new ideas and existing knowledge increases memory retention compared to just reading or hearing new information.

Tip: Guide learners to apply what they're learning to real-life problems to generate connections.

Emotion

Schemas are built more strongly when subtle positive emotion is present in the learning process. Negative and strong emotions interfere with our ability to learn.

Tip: Include activities that trigger somewhat positive emotions in learners to enhance memory retention.

Spacing

Returning to the material after some time has passed is key for learning retention.

Tip: When possible, build in time for sleep between lessons to help thoroughly encode what has been learned. Choose multiple spaced-out short sessions over one long session.
