TRANSLATOR'S FOREWORD

The Poems and the Personality

MANY WRITERS are known to us through poems and letters. When we like the poems, we often turn eagerly to the letters in order to get behind the scenes; the letters are an intimate, private communication, in contrast with the poems, which are universalized in result, however intense and personal their origin.

With Michelangelo we almost have to reverse this view. The surviving letters of Michelangelo have a distinctly public character; they show us the external man. Many of them are business letters and are thus offshoots from his art of sculpture; they are useful to the historian in fixing the dates of his activities and showing the sequence of his works. Many are to his family, but these, too, deal to a large extent with business matters, and it is typical that to learn of his emotional attachment to his family we have to turn to some of the poems.
