

Project Key Requirements

- Demonstrate Cal Poly CubeSat Lab's ability to implement MPPT
- Handle up to 100W from the solar array
- Interface the solar array and the solar cells on the side panels, allowing both to charge the batteries
- Charge and manage the batteries on the CubeSat
- Provide voltage rails at 1.8V, 3.3V, 5.0V, and 30V
- Be capable of providing 3A of current for the 30V rail

Introduction

Cal Poly CubeSat Lab missions rely on Direct Energy Transfer (DET) to charge satellite batteries from solar panels. The project tackles the development of an Electrical Power System (EPS) that aims to verify Maximum Power Point Tracking (MPPT) capabilities for future Lab's space missions. Though DET has the advantage of requiring few electrical components for its implementation, MPPT enables the handling of power at min. 10% higher efficiency than DET.

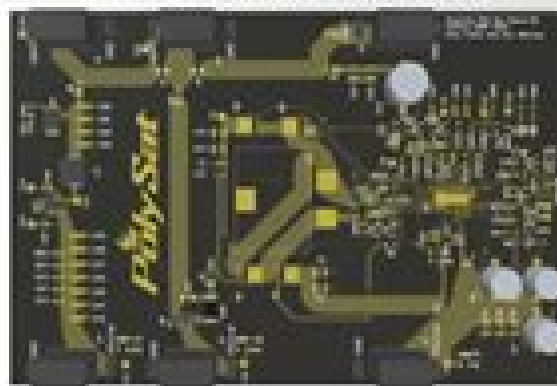

The EPS board is going to be used on a satellite called PowerSat, which is being designed in conjunction with Deployables GmbH, a "New Space" German company. In particular, the satellite will be a technology demonstration of their deployable solar array.

This project is partially supported by Cal Poly Aerospace Engineering Department.

Development Board Goals

- Test two MPPT ICs to find preferable IC for flight
- Test feasibility of implementing a DET and MPPT system on EPS
- Test the power limits supplied by data sheets to ensure chip capability of handling 100W

SURP Conclusion

In addition to the technical knowledge I have gained during SURP, I have also learned better virtual communication. Despite the obvious downsides of having to do SURP virtually, it has taught me how to work as a team online better than classes in the previous virtual quarters. Running meetings as opposed to listening to a Zoom lecture will hopefully make future quarters while in quarantine more productive as I will be better able to share ideas and work with classmates.

—Drew Evans

This SURP really allowed me to develop both my understanding of the development process from a systems engineering perspective and learn valuable knowledge of satellite power systems. Additionally I feel I have gained applicable experience for the Electrical Engineering field from both designing the schematic and the working on layout of the PCB.
