Shaping Our Selves Erik Parens,2015 When bioethicists debate the ethics of using technologies like surgery and pharmacology to shape our selves they are debating what it means for human beings to flourish They are debating what makes animals like us truly happy and whether the technologies at issue will bring us closer to or farther from such happiness The positions that participants adopt in debates regarding such ancient and fundamental questions are often polarized and cannot help but be deeply personal It is no wonder that these debates are sometimes acrimonious How can critics of and enthusiasts about technological self transformation move forward in the midst of polarizing arguments Based on his experience as a scholar at The Hastings Center the oldest free standing bioethics research institute in the world Erik Parens proposes a habit of thinking which he calls Binocular thinking lets us benefit from the insights that are visible from the stance of the enthusiast who emphasizes that using technology to creatively transform our selves will make us happier and to benefit from the insights that are visible from the stance of the critic who emphasizes that learning to let ourselves be will make us happier Because these debates ultimately entail critics and enthusiasts giving justifications for their own ways of being in the world they entail the exchange of more than just impartial reasons In the throes of our passion to make our case we exaggerate our insights and all too often fall into the conceptual traps that our languages constantly set for us Are human beings by nature creators or creatures Are technologies morally neutral or value laden Is disability a medical or a social phenomenon Indeed are we free or determined Parens explains how participating in these debates helped him articulate a habit of thinking which is better at benefiting from the insights embedded in both poles of those binaries than was the habit of thinking he brought

Holding Change adrienne maree brown, 2021-04-22 Facilitation and mediation are important skills in our highly organized world Holding Change is a guide for attending to both in ways that align with nature with pleasure with our best imaginings of our future It provides lessons for generating the ease necessary to move through life's inevitable struggles and for practicing the art of holding others without losing ourselves Black feminists have evolved this wisdom but it can serve anyone working to create change individually interpersonally and within our organizations The majority of the book is sourced from brown's twenty plus years of facilitation and mediation work with additional wisdom from a selection of living Black feminist facilitators and mediators
