small box of jewels but little else could he find on the ship and no food of any kind His design was to leave the ship as he found it carrying away only these tokens that his story when he arrived at Brattahlid might be received with faith and to direct where the ship might be sought for But as he quitted the cabin some of his men shouted from the deck where they had discovered yet another body frozen in a drift This was an old man seated with crossed legs and leaning against the mast having an ink horn slung about his neck and almost hidden by his grey beard and on his knee a book which he held with a thumb frozen between two pages This was the book which Snorri had brought to Brattahlid and which the Bishop of Gardar read aloud to him that same afternoon translating as he went the ink being fresh the writing clerly and scarcely a page damaged by the weather It bore no title but the Bishop who afterwards caused his secretary to take a copy of the tale gave it a very long one beginning God s mercy shown in a Miracle upon certain castaways from Jutland at the Feast of the Nativity of His Blessed Son our Lord in the year MCCCLVII whereby He made dead trees to put forth in leaf and comforted desperate men with summer in the midst of the Frozen Sea with much beside But all this appears in the tale which I will head only with the name of the writer The White Wolf and Other Fireside Tales Arthur Quiller-Couch,1902 The white wolf, and other fireside tales, by Q.
