Williams,2013-10-22 Perspectives on Behavioral Medicine Volume 2 Neuroendocrine Control and Behavior provides a selective overview of important recent developments in the neurosciences related to neuroendocrine control mechanisms which have important implications for major areas of interest in behavioral medicine The book begins with a general introductory chapter that presents a synthesis of related developments in the biomedical and behavioral sciences which have played an important role in the emergence of the field of behavioral medicine with particular emphasis on developments in behavioral biology concerned with neuroendocrine control The remaining chapters are organized into two parts Part I provides an introduction to recent developments concerning neuroendocrine control as well as a consideration of general implications of such developments for the stress field Part II shows how the integrative efforts of the first section might be applied toward improving our understanding of the role of behavioral and psychosocial factors in several specific illnesses

Epidemiology of Cancer of the Digestive Tract Pelayo Correa,W. Haenszel,2012-12-06 The digestive organs are the most frequent site of cancer in the world accounting for approximately 30% of all malignant tumors This prominent position has been present for many decades in spite of marked shifts in the frequency of cancer of specific organs The most remarkable shift has been the decrease in gastric cancer rates occurring concomitantly with an increase in colon cancer rates in most western industrialized societies Important exceptions to this rule as well as other epidemiologic evidence indicate that the opposite trends for gastric and colon cancers are not inevitable consequences of each other Although genetically determined precancerous syndromes are well recognized it is generally agreed that environmental factors play an overriding role in digestive cancer causation The most obvious environmental factors seem to be the result of what we eat drink or smoke Although the nutritional component of the diet is of unquestionable importance the nonnutrient elements in our diet have also proven to be influential causative factors Several studies have focused on the microenvironment at the level of the mucosa or the digestive organs as a microcosmos where forces promoting and inhibiting carcinogenesis are operating for a prolonged period of time Their interaction eventually determines the presence or absence of a malignant tumor Our understanding of such modulating forces hopefully will someday allow us to modify the microenvironment in a favorable way and attain the goal of cancer prevention
