

Mental health care in the community: An analysis of contemporary public attitudes towards, and public representations of, mental illness

BEN HANNIGAN

School of Nursing Studies, University of Wales College of Medicine, Cardiff, UK

Abstract

Public tolerance of, and non-discrimination towards, people with mental health problems are key factors on which success in achieving the goal of community-based mental health care depends. This paper revisits Thomas Scheff's (1966) sociological theory of mental illness, and tests elements of this thorough critical review of recent UK literature relating to public attitudes towards, and media representations, of mental illness. Negative representations predominate in the media, while a significant minority of the UK public appear to possess negative attitudes towards people with mental health problems and their care and social participation in the community. These findings support aspects of Scheff's theory. Implications for policy and practice are discussed, including the need to challenge stigmatising and discriminatory attitudes and behaviours.

Introduction

Success in realising the broad goal of providing community-focused care for people with mental health problems is dependent upon the achievement of a number of key conditions (Repper & Brooker, 1996). These include: the establishment of comprehensive community alternatives to in-patient care, particularly for people with severe and enduring mental health problems (Department of Health, 1996; Welsh Office, 1996); the affording to people experiencing mental health problems all the rights of full citizenship as are afforded to other individuals throughout the UK (Perkins & Repper, 1996); and tolerance and non-discrimination on the part of local communities (Bhugra, 1989).

This paper is concerned with the latter two of the above conditions. The aims therefore are: to explore attitudes towards mental illness; to explore attitudes towards people experiencing mental health problems and their care in the community; and to explore public representations of mental illness.

To provide a coherent theoretical framework within which to review recent empirical studies which have investigated these issues, Thomas Scheff's sociological theory of mental illness is used (Scheff, 1966). The utility

A Neighborhood Divided Jane Balin, 2018-10-18 When a nursing facility for AIDS patients is planned for a city neighborhood residents might be expected to respond Not in my backyard But as Jane Balin recounts in A Neighborhood Divided when that community is known for its racial and ethnic diversity and liberal attitudes public reaction becomes less predictable and in many ways more important to comprehend An ethnographer who spent two years talking with inhabitants of a progressive neighborhood facing this prospect Jane Balin demonstrates that the controversy divided residents in surprising ways She discovered that those most strongly opposed to the facility lived furthest away that families with young children were evenly represented in the two camps and that African Americans followed a Jewish community leader in opposing the home while dismissing their own minister's support of it By viewing each side sympathetically and allowing participants to express their true feelings about AIDS the author invites readers to recognize their own anxieties over this sensitive issue Balin's insightful work stresses the importance of uncovering the ideologies and fears of middle-class Americans in order to understand the range of responses that AIDS has provoked in our society Its ethnographic approach expands the parameters of NIMBY research
