PATENT ABUSES KEEP PRESCRIPTION DRUGS UNAFFORDABLE

Charlie Katelbi

TOPLINE POINTS

- ★ The cost of prescription drugs has skyrocketed over the past 10 years.
- ★ A key reason drugs are so expensive is that brand-name drug manufacturers abuse America's patent system and the Food and Drug Administration's drug approval process to artificially block generic competition and raise prices.
- ★ Policymakers can enhance competition and make prescription drugs more affordable by closing loopholes in America's patent system that allow brand-name drug manufacturers to delay competition.

America's patent system and the Food and Drug Administration's (FDA) drug approval process have promoted enormous pharmaceutical breakthroughs that have saved and improved the lives of millions of Americans. Unfortunately, both systems also contain numerous loopholes that allow drug manufacturers to block competitors from selling affordable generic versions of their drugs.

These patent abuses have significantly increased the cost of prescription drugs and made it harder for patients to access the medications they need. A plentiful supply of generic options is essential to lowering the cost of prescription drugs. Policymakers must close the loopholes in America's patent system and drug approval process and end these harmful abuses. This will ensure that families can access cutting-edge pharmaceutical innovations and affordable generic drugs.
