Abstract: This article is an analysis of Bruce Matthews's "Pillagers' Quest" and related works published in the 1980s as a contribution to the New South, including the author's discussion of the region's postcolonial status after World War II. Matthews and New Southland practitioners, including those in contemporary historiography, are cited. The author is critical of doing history in the 1980s and 1990s, when "New" or "postcolonial" and "postmodern" had replaced the language of the New South itself. The significance of this history is that it has been a means of re-examination of the region.
