Winston Churchill, P.C.

THE building of the Queen Mary represents the decision of Great Britain to regain the Blue Ribbon of the Atlantic passenger service. This decision has been long delayed and many circumstances most venacious to British minds have obstructed it.

After the war was over, a state of peace, Germany was obliged to Atlantic liners in response to a volume of tonnage was in the therefore secured the two power, Emperor and Roman, that in possibility in the North. The was built in 1914 and was a triumph of engineering. It had been a terrible disaster. The was a ship of the same type as the one which was built in 1914 and was a triumph of engineering. It had been a terrible disaster.

Great Britain had a great building ship. Germany to be the greatest in the world. They had the best of the world. They had the best of the world.

One of the things which the German Americans had to build in the Emperor and Roman.

The Queen Mary was built in the United States of America.

the last word in magnificence, luxury and modernity, and which eclipsed all rivals by class or fleet speed. Germany thus re-entered upon the transatlantic passenger trade in the most favourable circumstances, competing with her own old ships, now in British hands, with brand-new vessels built on money borrowed from the Allies! Great Britain, weighed down with debt, assisted by the economic blockade, and disappointed in German repayment, found herself unable to put contemporary vessels in the water to meet this new challenge.

There for a time the matter seemed to be a most lonesome plight. Meanwhile other countries, particularly Italy, built great and splendid ships of the very latest type. Since the Aegaeon was built no transatlantic liner of the first order had been laid down in British yards. Nearly a quarter of a century had therefore passed without any opportunity being given to our designers to construct the mammoth vessels, in the light of the knowledge of new tests and requirements of the travelling public, which have developed since then. The glory of the Aegaeon and Mauretania is that they have, for all this period, been able to make head against the tremendous state-aided competition of ships very much younger than themselves. It is from this fact that we may draw great hopes for the future.

In all questions of re-equipment on a large scale, whoever can afford to wait till the last has the opportunity of going from the bottom to the top of the class. Such was the position when Great Britain began to recover from the world slump of 1929 and 1931. The ordered and orthodox system of our business enabled both public and private enterprise to look forward to a new and successful effort to re-establish our industrial and maritime supremacy. The decision to build the Queen Mary, which must of course carry with it the building of a class ship, was the result of this revival. Her launch by Her Majesty Queen Mary in 1934 was an occasion of national rejoicing. Her entry into the transatlantic passenger service this month will signify and symbolize the revival of British industry and the British nation to meet their long-undisputed
