Treatment for Cumulative Trauma Disorders Using a Person-centered Approach James W. King (M.S.), 2018 Cumulative trauma disorders CTDs are musculoskeletal disorders that impact health and productivity CTD risk factors are present in the workplace home and community Occupational therapists OTs are widely involved with this population Many OTs use a medical model in the assessment treatment and prevention of these conditions however the medical model has not proven to be consistently effective This research took a different approach It explored psychosocial factors in CTD development and progression then used the findings to develop and test a curriculum designed to guide OTs with a person centered treatment approach based on the Theory of Occupational Adaptation OA Results indicated the curriculum was effective and relevant for the OT participants Their feedback highlighted the value of the curriculum content The study explored the feasibility of performing a multi center randomized controlled trial RCT to measure the effectiveness of the person centered approach for improving occupational performance in a CTD population Cumulative Trauma Disorders
