

Neurotransmitters, Hormones and pheromones (Proceedings of the American Chemical Society Symposium, Washington D.C., U.S.A., August 1987) edited by Terry E. Acree and Daniel M. Soderbaum. Walter de Gruyter, Berlin, 1987, pp. x + 289. Dfl 140.

It does not seem long ago that animals were considered deaf, dumb and visually blind. Karl von Frisch, the discoverer of the honey bee dance language showed us even of this repulsive insect, not willing to believe that bees were cognitively advanced merely for the aesthetic pleasure of human beings, showed that honey bees not only had colour vision but that they could also sense colours such as ultraviolet to which we humans are blind. Finally, along with Niko Tinbergen and Konrad Lorenz we set out to develop the science of animal behaviour called Ethology. A major triumph of modern ethology has been to show that much of animal behaviour can be broken down into fixed action patterns that are predictably evoked by characteristically simple external stimuli. Egg returning behaviour in geese which is normally triggered by a red egg lying outside but also the goose will also be released by bear cubs, light trails, smooth stones or any object even as vaguely resembling an egg. Herring-gull chicks which normally begin to beg at the approach of their mother can be induced to show the same response by appropriately yellowing a patch as long as it has a bright red spot on its leg like the mother's patch. Male blackbirds which develop a bright red belly during the reproductive period not only attract their own beloved neighbours but anything that is red, even floating away the refinements of pecking and grating noises! The simplicity of the releasers is a source of great satisfaction because we now know that even single nerve cells are capable of responding
