Perhaps the best known figure in the Dorling series, during the time in continuous production from the start of the range in 1910 to the present day.

Designed perhaps by people by A. A. Miles or Robert

Long, however, the figure was given its name after

Queen Mary had picked it out as an early display of Dorling figures, exclaiming "Don't let a darling" standing in the factory records, the first example of and a new produced in April 1910.

Charles Wyse, 1874-1910, was born in the Farnham

Department in Dorling's in 1874 as a modeller and sculptor, he quickly showed his skills, winning several gold medals and scholarships and exhibiting his work publicly, including at the Royal Academy. He designed many figures for Dorling, including the very successful

Dorling, before establishing his own studio in Chelsea in 1900 where he produced figures and experimented with new glazes. Several later Dorling figures, for example

The Mother Woman, The Fairy Woman and The Corpse

Woman, were to have much in common with Wyse's

Charles models.

Elizabeth Fry, a Quaker, known as 'the Quaker of Slavery', returned an international reputation for her work in prison reform, and for her concern for the poor, sailors and destitute. Coming from a comfortable East Anglian

Quaker family, she learned the tenets of early methodist society reform, and gradually improved the conditions she found through her efforts, which finally resulted in Parliamentary reforms.

The model was based on a statue of Mrs. Fry by A.

Dunlop, R.A., now standing inside the central entrance area in the Old Bailey, London, which in 1910 was taken from the famous grounds by Gilbert.
