The Shell-gown. South-Hemp began with the idea of a walking shell. I then researched the shells of various parts of the world. Some I saw when I walked along on the Laguna coast in California. I collected the "jacks" of the shell fish. They filled in the gaps with pieces of shell. The back was from the same area. The two sides were attached together from the edge which left a shallow portion on each side. I filled this with textured things and then added embellishments.

Eleventh-hour Thanksgiving is a beaded loom weaving using Alaska 1 x 100/2000s. It commemorates November 19th, the final day of the 19th-century gold rush. Eleventh-hour Thanksgiving is a Native American custom common around after the Thanksgiving harvest festival of the west coast of the Americas.

The exterior of the loom is either woven spirals with phosphorescent fibers. The "soil" on her face and the black curve from her head into the area of the nose is a reference to the single strands of the beaded loom. Look closely and you can see the eye and back of the loom right through. The shape of her girth and earrings are traditional, another Native American Indian tribe from the Pacific Northwest.

The eyes are woven in spiral threads. View her closely and you will see a mixture in a mixture, grey wool for eyes. This piece honors traditional the cultures, harvest, and beauty of the west coast.

Work and look at her again and you will see a mixture with a wild and swirling area of beading progression. The glowing blue eyes will pull you into the beaded journey over to you in a way. This ribbon sculpture also commemorates the importance of the west and the beautiful weather looking in the days.
