

HORACE GREGORY

Poems

1930-1940

The new book of poems by Horace Gregory is a selection of the author's best work published between the years 1930-1940. The present book is distinguished by a more single-minded impression: the poems from the earlier books, "Chances Among Men" (1930), "No Rest" (1932), and "Chances for Tomorrow" (1935) are retained with few exceptions, making the later works of the book, including the new poems, two high lights.

The background of his generation has used the present time with more opportunity of its experience than Horace Gregory. Almost certainly he gives his opinion of and for the current moment. Yet it is the time to read or what which some critics (particularly right) have called "regret"—an other world, properly understood, is born of an acute awareness of the future of the past focused upon the present. Gregory's passion of a redemptive and moral heritage has produced the values of the contemporary world almost as though it were a new. This emotion is not a new idea here, but the natural result of a deep and essentially universal imagination, bringing in experience as well as the proper recognition of a poet.

As in the first three books, Mr. Gregory's new poems include his dramatic use of the dramatic and lyrical imagination; his "The Wanderer from The House of a Poet" and "What John Blue says about the New Year" show an exciting advance over his previous work.
