

Emergency Medical Care in the Soviet Union

BORIS D. KOMAROV, MD

Emergency medical care is provided to all patients throughout the Soviet Union free of charge, with close ties to practical activity as well as medical science and investigation. The unified system of emergency medical care organization functions over the entire country. Emergency medical care is rendered by emergency stations (departments). As of January 1, 1983, 4,627 stations were functioning, staffed by some 40,000 physicians and about 100,000 median-level medical personnel, and responding to more than 80 million calls per year.

EMERGENCY MEDICAL CARE ORGANIZATION

The concept of emergency medical care implies, first, the infrastructure (stations, ambulances, specially equipped transport, etc.); second, the complex of measures aimed at the organization of emergency medical care provided to the population (delivery of equipment and qualified physicians to the patients); third, the principle of medical institution activity (the rendering of emergency care expeditiously, with constant readiness, especially in critical situations).

The emergency medical system (EMS) in the majority of settlements formed and developed according to the principle of territorial division, taking into consideration the architectural and planning division into districts. The network of emergency care stations—the optimum variant—began to develop in the towns, where the principle of this service organization provided the creation of a central station and district emergency care substations.

Substations of the EMS are located on the territory of the town, taking into account the population number and density, of the planned zones, main travel routes, traffic intensity, frequency of road accidents, etc. The main criterion for evaluation of a substation's capacity and its location in the population zone is the rated capability of the medical ambulance teams to arrive at any point of the assigned zone less than 15 minutes from the moment the call is received.

The following factors determine EMS organization effectiveness: optimum development and rational location of stations and EMS departments; efficient work of the control service receiving calls and dispatching ambulance teams; ambulance dispatch in the shortest time; efficient hospitalization (centralized registration of spare beds in hospitals, maternity homes, and other medical institutions); cooperation between the ambulance teams and hospitals' physicians in treatment of patients; scientific methodological coordination of the stations' work on the part of medical institutions and hospitals; the availability of specialized ambulance teams (e.g., cardiologic, anesthetic, pediatric, toxicological) at the EMS stations.

The activity of EMS stations is regulated by special rules of the Ministry of Public Health, which establish the principles of EMS stations' work, staff, and transport norms as well as listing the necessary equipment and instructions.

The standard project established by the Ministry of Public Health stipulates the following main structural subunits of the EMS stations: management (administrative-organizational department); operative department; hospitalization department; transport department; ambulance teams; statistics department.

The operative department is responsible for receiving calls, coordinating the ambulance teams' work, and informing the substations and population. The universal centralized access number, 03, is analogous to 911 in the United States. Calls are received at the EMS stations by a controller (operator), usually a graduate of a medical school. The senior physician on duty, if necessary, may redistribute the transport, change the staff of ambulance teams, and take measures for more effective usage of resources in case of disaster. For accidents and emergency cases, the central station has at its operative department additional communication equipment and mobile radio stations working at several frequencies with definite stations and teams.
