

subject was similar to it in the first edition catalogue, and his exhibits at the Old Water Society from 1843 through 1845 consisted of scenes of Italy.

No. 185 is presumably a view drawn on the rather than a later reworking. According to A. H. Palmer, his father's practice was to elaborate studies out-of-doors, spending consecutive days on a single drawing. To in sketching he used warm middle-tint body-color (or gouache), which is very a no. 185. The rapid notation in pencil of detail also differs from the more polished technique of Palmer's finished works.

In contrast to the relatively private nature of Palmer's Shoreham views, no. 185 shows probably the all-time favorite subject of painting, the so-called Temple of the Sun, the neighboring waterfalls at Tivoli. Although nothing left of Palmer's Shoreham studies does represent the scene under a transfiguring sunset. As A. H. Palmer wrote in most of the studies from his father's trip, it presents "a golden and glittering scene." Palmer lost his visionary intensity, but throughout his life a Virgilian idealism of crumbling temples and shepherds will appear and reappear in his later work. A.S.
