

FIG. 2

DECANTER, circa 1895-1900

Designed and manufactured by John G. D.

Germany: Krefeld-Borlum, near Düsseldorf

Transparent emerald green lead glass, polished silver-plated

Height 15 inches

Collection of John Webster Kirk

This stylish decanter reflects the study of plants and organic form undertaken by European designers formulating the Art Nouveau style. The plant forms have been successfully translated into flowing curvilinear elements. The European Art Nouveau style, was, however, somewhat foreign-appearing to suit American taste. The preferred recognizable, non-abstract forms, rather more traditional forms. One solution was the softly rounded feet of small porcelain vases, lifting the decanter from the table, so that it was not sitting too solidly on a surface. Some designers were to employ similar decorative jardinières and compotes.

MARTELE BOWL, G. D., 1905

1904-standard silver, silver-plated

USA: Gorham Manufacturing Corporation, Providence, Rhode Island

Height 2 5/8 inches, Width 12 inches, Depth 9 1/2 inches

Catalogue Number 65

The G. D. Bowl was completed in the summer of 1905, the year that the Gorham Manufacturing Corporation was established. It was one of the first pieces of the new American Art Nouveau style, which was a blend of the European Art Nouveau style and the American taste for the new style.

other numerous art journals published toward.

However, the Gorham Manufacturing Corporation as its market for Martele silver. Instead, this attracted the most affluent clients of America's quality but were not necessarily intellectuals, comfortable and acceptable while anything is confrontational and too challenging. Hand-in-affluent tend to be conservative, avoiding obvious. Obviously, both of these factors were in place and thus presented Codman and Holbrook a product that was stylish, elegant and new whose solution was to present a version of the Art Nouveau modification of its European elements. That Art Nouveau style was both a marketing and a part of the American Art Nouveau idiom: a contribution in metal to the United States is recognized until recently.

Codman and Holbrook correctly judge examples of Martele only if they were not too and not too unfamiliar to the purchaser. The modernism of the French Art Nouveau style, the Paris Métro stations by Hector Guimard, too foreign to be acceptable to American taste. The design of the Kayserlin decanter (fig. 2) was conventional American taste, which desired without its European extremes. The solution, Art Nouveau style with more conservative American-associated designers was to place familiar but relatively familiar curvilinear forms and their decorative principles (fig. 3, catalogue number line were given undulating, rippling edges with ornament of flowers, birds and foliage. Such Art Nouveau dictum that the ornament of is to enhance both its surface and its form. This not too unfamiliar or too startling in form, by overlay of Art Nouveau detail, all of which is American taste.

While effectively solving the problem appealing to the American consumer, the Martele Art Nouveau style. This identifiable and significant movement has only infrequently been the subject mentioned at the beginning of this essay, was has been overshadowed by the figure of Louis portrayed him as the sole American practitioner can point to the brilliant ornament of the G.
