Introduction

Food is a complex phenomenon encompassing issues as diverse as agriculture, biology, culture, health, environment, the emotions or the socio-economic field (de Garine, 1979; Douglas, 1979; López García, Mariano, & Medina, 2016; Medina, Aguilar, & Solé-Sedeño, 2014). In contemporary global context, the listed issues seem to be aligned, under an emerging food-and-health paradigm. Thus, within the shifts of the health discourses that have taken part in the building of what is called Food Modernity, nutritional narratives have reached new arenas of expression.

Food in society while primarily being a local focus, where communities or nations secured their own provision has become a global internationalise trade. The present food system has the potential to feed the whole of humanity and preventing hunger (D'Odorico, Carr, Laio, Ridolfi, & Vandoni, 2014). However, society is identifying new challenges in terms of the healthiness and sustainability of the different diets (Dernini et al., 2017; Serra-Majem & Medina, 2015) as whole food systems (the recently published and controversial article by Willett et al., 2019, should be a good example). On the other hand, the food field has developed and demands its own methodologies, increasingly seeking interdisciplinarity (de Garine, 2004; McClancy & Macbeth, 2004). As Bosman and Eorn (2019) points out in their article published in this collection, the benefit of exploring and designing around the theme of food science and technology exists in the transdisciplinary nature of food which covers the gamut of business viability and economic analysis, customer desirability and consumer behaviours, and technical feasibility and prototyping.

In this regard, both quantitative (especially in the case of nutrition, food science and biochemistry, but also some visions of sociology, eg. González Turiso & Mataix, 2004; Mehta & Allison, 2014) and, especially, qualitative approaches (from all those perspectives that correspond mainly to the social field, but not only, eg. Hubert, 2004; Medina, 2004) are actually demanding the light of a new and more specialized focus.

We have also to recognize that, in the last two and half decades, the Internet has taken over our lives. In this not-new-anymore environment, different aspects of our daily life have acquired an important presence in the virtual world: immediate communication, social networks, especially with the popularization of applications on mobile devices... But also different aspects of our daily life (from digital signatures to "going online" to the supermarket...). Within this context of internationalisation, food
