Introduction

The participation of users and survivors of psychiatry is indispensable in mental health research. In this regard, their expertise is essential to clarify ambiguities and guide public policies and mental health services. Since recovery in mental health has been defined in different ways, achieving a consensus on the main elements that define it has important implications.

Objective

This study aimed to establish an international consensus on the main elements that define recovery from the perspective of users and survivors of psychiatry.

Procedure

We sent the invitation to associations of users and survivors around the world.

101 users and survivors consented to participate.

The Delphi Method

The research team designed three rounds of questioning. The participants received an email with a link to the corresponding questionnaire hosted on the Qualtrics software platform.

The first round

The first questionnaire contained 4 open-ended questions:

- Q1: What does recovery in mental health mean to you?
- Q2: What tells you that a person is progressing in their recovery?
- Q3: What factors facilitate the recovery process?
- Q4: What factors hinder the recovery process?

41 users and survivors completed the questionnaire.

Data analysis

Using a qualitative approach, we analyze the participants' responses to finally develop statements to be rated on their relevance on a Likert scale in the second and third rounds. After the second and third rounds, we calculated the percentage of agreement regarding the relevance of each statement.

The second round

The second questionnaire was structured based on the four questions from the first round. For each question, statements derived from the previous answers were listed.

The statements rated as "relevant" or "very relevant" by at least 80% of the participants reached a consensus. The statements rated as "relevant" or "very relevant" by less than 70% were considered to disagree.

77 users and survivors completed the questionnaire.

The third round

The third questionnaire contained those statements rated as "relevant" or "very relevant" by 70-79% of participants. The questionnaire contained feedback about their previous rating response to each statement and the agreement reached by the entire panel of experts.

77 users and survivors completed the questionnaire.

Results

77 statements were agreed upon as a consensus. You can find in the QR code the statements with the highest agreement (>90%).

Conclusion

The statements that reached the highest percentage of agreement highlight the relevance of human rights, empowerment, and self-determination to the recovery process. Findings contribute to a better understanding of recovery based on the perspective of survivors of psychiatry and users to support public policies and mental health services.
