

Panic Disorder with Agoraphobia

Involves both panic attacks and a fear of situations or places where escape might be difficult or help may not be readily available.

Panic Disorder with Agoraphobia often leads to avoidance situations and activities.

Panic Disorder with Agoraphobia typically has a gradual onset, where individuals may initially experience panic attacks in specific situations or places that they associate with fear or potential difficulty in escape.

Females tend to have panic disorder with agoraphobia three times more than males.

Panic Disorder without Agoraphobia

Involves recurrent panic attacks without the specific fear and avoidance of certain situations or places.

Generally does not lead to significant avoidance or restriction of activities.

Panic Disorder without Agoraphobia often has an abrupt onset, where individuals experience recurrent panic attacks that are not necessarily associated with specific situations or environments.

Females get panic disorders about two times more than males do.
