

Chapter 9 International Issues in Public Finance

9.1 Introduction

Trade taxes are a far more important component of central government revenue for developing countries than they are for developed countries, as you can see the differences in shares of trade taxes in total government revenues. In order to attract foreign direct investment, many countries engage in corporate tax competition which may end up with revenue loss without economic benefits. The growth of multi-national enterprises (MNEs) presents increasingly complex taxation issues for both tax administrations and the MNEs themselves since separate country rules for the taxation of MNEs cannot be viewed in isolation but must be addressed in a broad international context.

9.2 Trade versus Non-trade Taxes

If we were to compare the welfare costs of raising revenue by a tax on imports and by a consumption tax, the analysis would favor the more general consumption tax.

Figure 9.1 shows the home supply curve S for a product (good x) and the domestic demand curve D . The world price of imports is OP^* , so that up to quantity OQ^* it is cheaper to produce the good at home than to import. After this point, it is cheaper to import the good than to use resources producing an additional unit at home. At the price OP^* a total of OQ^* is demanded so that imports are q^1q^* .
