

Scientific DataLink's Artificial Intelligence Classification Scheme

David L. Waltz

Brandeis University, Waltham, MA; and Thinking Machines Corp., Cambridge, MA

About a year ago, I was approached by Phoebe Huang of Comtex Scientific Corporation who hoped that I would help devise a dramatically expanded index for topics in AI, to aid Comtex in indexing the series of AI memos and reports that they had been gathering. Comtex had tried to get the ACM to expand and update its classification, but was told that ACM had just revised the listing two years or so ago, and did not intend to revise it again for a while; even if they did, the revision might require a year or more to complete. Comtex wanted the new classification within six to eight weeks. I agreed to take on the task, thinking it wouldn't be too hard.

The major decision I had to make was whether to use the existing ACM index scheme and add to it, or to start with a fresh sheet of paper and devise my own. I thought that the ACM's placement of expert systems and application in the same major category was inappropriate—some expert systems work is quite theoretical and experimental, and many applications (e.g., robotics) have nothing to do with expert systems. On the other hand, many articles have been classified using the ACM scheme over the years, and there is value in continuity. Nevertheless, I felt it was time to devise a fresh scheme. I went through all the other index schemes I could find, including an IEEE list and the indices of several texts. I also looked through several ICAI and AAAI Proceedings for topics. I tried to keep each topic that was mentioned several times, and to put each topic in a natural place in a hierarchy of topics; if there was no single suitable place, I placed topics in more than one place and kept cross-references. When I finished a rough layout, I found that for the most part, it really didn't differ much from the ACM index at the top levels (only on some terminology and on the expert systems-applications issue). On reflection, I decided to stick with ACM's top two levels, only adding, not modifying, major headings.

My main reasons were 1) that there really is value in continuity, and 2) that the most important function of an index is to allow someone reasonably knowledgeable in the field to locate the index numbers and literature references for a topic without too much difficulty. By these criteria, I think the index is adequate.

The classification is certainly not adequate as a reflection of the organization of AI as a field, and it will also become rapidly dated. Whether it can even accommodate AI for the next five years or beyond is a difficult question to answer. My feeling is that it probably doesn't matter, largely because of work now being done in AI within five years, I suspect we will have much smarter on-line index and retrieval systems, and that there will be little need for an index of the sort I've produced, a last vestige of the era of paper-oriented information.
