

HARRY BECKER, whose work forms such an admirable commentary on Adrian Bell's famous trilogy, was one of the surprisingly numerous company of artists who have sprung from the wind-swept land of East Angles. With its rich pasture and ploughland in the west and black marshland and saltmarsh field as it nears the sea, it offers an inexhaustible variety to the artist's searching eye, and it is perhaps significant that the greatest masters of English landscape—Gainsborough and Constable, Cotman and Turner—were also natives of Norfolk and Suffolk and never needed to go further afield for their inspiration. Although Becker died in 1948, it is felt that in him has been found an ideal illustrator for Adrian Bell, an example, indeed, of how two men, devoted to the expression of the same thing in different media, may build a perfect collaboration, even through collaboration, as such, did not take place with the knowledge of either.
