Reducing CO2 Emissions John L.R. Proops, Malte Faber, Gerhard Wagenhals, 2012-12-06 The global greenhouse effect may be one of the greatest challenges ever to face humankind If fossil fuel use and the consequent CO emissions continue to increase at their current trend there is the possibility that over the next century there will be massive climate change and the flooding of coastal areas The economics profession is beginning to respond to this challenge through seeking to understand the economic processes which determine the demand for energy the proportion of this energy supplied by fossil fuels and the policy instruments available for reducing fossil fuel demand while still supplying appropriate amounts of energy This study is a contribution to that literature We examine the impact of structural changes in the German and UK economies upon CO emissions over the last two decades and explore the potential for further structural change to reduce such emissions This study is different from much of the current literature in that we do not presuppose that the respective economies consist of only one or a few sectors Instead we analyse the interrelationships of 47 sectors for about 20 years using input output methods We also deal with the effects of the changing sectoral structure of imports and exports of these two countries on the responsibility for CO emissions On the basis of this extensive evidence we have a solid foundation to develop different scenarios to show how the Toronto target of reducing CO emissions by 20% over 20 years can be achieved
