CAN POLITICS PRACTICE COMPASSION?

We are all familiar with realist notions of politics as power and of global politics as a balance of power between competing states. On realist terms, the idea that politics is ultimately for the well-being of citizens becomes subordinate to national security and international order, and military force and economic globalisation are readily justified. Within such a context, the question of whether politics can practice compassion appears irrelevant. I dispute this conclusion. In this paper, I suggest that feminist ethics of care are applicable to realpolitik. Particularly in the post-September 11th 2001 era, issues of vulnerability and the need for careful security are prevalent. The questions as to how nations deal with the vilification or the reconciliation of cultural and religious differences are also central. I draw on examples of asylum-seekers and the 'war against terrorism' to demonstrate that the politics of care can address 'hard' political concerns. I argue that politics can practice compassion by enabling citizens to enjoy an inclusive belonging that encourages active participation. Political care occurs with: an attentiveness to the needs of vulnerable people who are experiencing pain, marginalisation, belittlement and suffering; an active listening to the voices of the vulnerable; open compassionate, appropriate responses to particular needs.
