

The Politics of Production

Factory Regimes under Capitalism and Socialism

- By Michael Burawoy
(London: Verso, 1985)

Book Review – By Tanzeem Ahmed (PhD Research Scholar, CISLS, JNU)

Citation (in APA): Burawoy, Michael (1985): The Politics of Production: Factory Regimes under Capitalism and Socialism, London: Verso.

Undoubtedly a significant contribution to studies of labour processes, Burawoy's The Politics of Production (1985) is primarily a continuation of his previous book of 1979, Manufacturing Consent. Having already specified his object of study in his previous work, which is the shortcomings in Marx and Braverman's understanding of life inside the large modern, unionised, corporations with strong internal labour markets, Burawoy, in The Politics of Production, primarily looks at the conditions under which consent and coercion in the workers are produced in factory settings.

Braverman's Labour and Monopoly Capital (1974) indeed cast a long shadow over debates on the nature of work in the late twentieth and early twenty first centuries. Since its publication and mostly from the late 1970s, debates around the issue of the 'labour process' in capitalist society developed in many countries. Ever since, issues of control and management of the working class population in novel ways has been the subject of rigorous academic discourse, of which Burawoy's The Politics of Production is also a product of.
