Introduction

Literary text is the interaction of various systems that organize text on semantic and pragmatic levels (internally), and at the level of its formal structure (external field) generated by the functioning of multi-level linguistic units combined on a limited text space. In addition to the fact that the text acts as a unit of communication, the fact that the text is a unit of psychological and speech and pragmatic character is widely recognized.

The pragmatic aspect of the text acts as a natural reflection of this aspect of communication as an aspect that can be of learning. Even though pragmatics as a section of the theory of the sign has been studied for a decade, a pragmatic approach to the description of the language phenomena appeared only in the 40s of the twentieth century - and is still being developed. For the first time, the term "pragmatics" was introduced into a scientific use of one of the founders of Semiotics by Ch. Morris (Morris, 1983). However, its influence is felt by all branches of linguistics, which has found an expression in the turn of linguistic studies towards the text as a unit of describing the pragmatism aspect of linguistics. The research in the field of linguistic pragmatic is distinguished by an exceptional multidimension (H.P. Grays, D. Heimz, R.Ch. Standard, D. Wunderlich, D. Vanderweken, T.A. Van Dijk, S. Levinson, J. Lich, I.P. Susov, G.G. Povlenpoley, O.G. Povlenpunts, Yu.S. Stepanov, T.V. Buzina, N.D. Arutyunova, E.V. Paducheva, A.E. Kibrik, I.M. Kobzeva, V.Z. Demyankov, V.I. Kabaian).
