

SCHOOL EFFECTIVENESS RESEARCH: ITS MESSAGES FOR SCHOOL IMPROVEMENT

Sheila Riddell and Sally Brown (editors) (HMSO for SOED, 1991), pp. vi + 77, £6.75

ANDREW MCPHERSON

In the past fifteen years we have learned a lot about the correlates of effective schooling and have achieved a better understanding of the questions and values we invoke when judging the work of teachers and schools. But two other tasks have proved more difficult. One is to produce plausible explanations of how schools achieve, maintain or lose effectiveness. The other is to apply the knowledge we have, whether as researchers or practitioners, to the task of school improvement.

During this time, the world has not waited for our answers. Two changes of particular significance have occurred. First, the task of judging and improving schools has been laicised, taken away from teachers, education authorities and academics and handed over to parents, consumers and markets. Second, central government has sought both to regulate these markets and to maintain a form of accountability by creating a framework of quality assurance that relies heavily on indicators of performance. Public administration has been retooled with methods borrowed from research, but research itself has been subjected to greater controls and opened up to private-sector markets.

These changes are reflected in the character of this volume. It was commissioned by HMI who also asked the University of Stirling, where Sally Brown is a Professor of Education, to organise a companion conference on the effectiveness of schooling (see Eric Drever 'School Effectiveness: Criteria and Evidence', Spotlight 31, Scottish Council for Research in Education, 1991). The Riddell and Brown volume is just one of a multi-volume range of resources provided by SOED. Other volumes include those on relative ratings, standard examination tables, and indicators of ethos and effectiveness, volumes in which, incidentally, the authorship of the volume reviewed here is attributed to SOED itself.

Riddell and Brown have aimed the book at practitioners and especially at local authorities. It attempts, they write, to '... make the link between the practical efforts of local authorities or schools to improve their educational provision, and the research findings about the characteristics of effective schools and strategies for school improvements' (p. 1, editors' emphases).

Up to a point, the volume succeeds. The chapters are clear and accessible, and offer concise summaries of the research fields that interest their authors. Peter Mortimore and David Reynolds respectively describe findings on effectiveness at the primary- and secondary-school stages. Gray and colleagues evaluate the early attempts of education authorities in England and Wales to incorporate indicators of school performance in their advisory and inspectorial functions. Then two chapters, by Louise Stoll and David Hopkins, discuss the strategies for improvement that are open to local authorities and individual schools. In a final chapter, the editors
