

Political Self

The aspect of a person who is concerned with laws or other political aspects is their political self. One might consider which of their rights are under jeopardy. This would show what political position would be in line with one's personal interests.

Kendall (1998)

"Man in nature is a political animal" defines politics as a social institution through which people in groups gain and wield power. It functions as a means for people to gain power and comprehend how a democratic system should work.

Stevens, Anglin and Jussim (2015)

- Their identity is heavily influenced by politics.
- Organizes one's views, convictions, and connections and facilitates the processing of information with a political context.
- It is information on the Constitution, the government, and governance.
- represents the goals and ambitions of the populace, reflects the laws and principles of the States, and establishes the position and authority of the populace, which is frequently determined by citizenship.

Ma. Serena Diokno (1997)

- Political self-awareness and identity are established through socialization, which is the process through which people acquire the information, customs, attitudes, and behaviors that are suitable for their places in a group or society. The political self is impacted and transformed by the ideas, remarks, and recommendations of other people. Through social contact, people gain the position, responsibilities, rights, and authority necessary to engage successfully with others in the group and community.
