"The first and noblest application of music is in offering the tribute of praise to the immortals; the next is the purifying, regulating and harmonizing the soul."

Plutarch

Abstract

The likelihood that the ancient Egyptians passed on their knowledge of the seven types of musical scales to Pythagoras, Plato and others who studied with them makes the currently accepted view that the musical modes of ancient Greece were keys rather than octave species highly implausible. The ten Hebrew Godnames known to Kabbalah are found to prescribe the intervallic composition of these scales. Both Plato's Lambda and the first four polygons enfolded in the inner form of the Tree of Life embody the minimum number of different intervals between the notes of the seven modes. Remarkable parallels between the intervallic composition of the latter and the tetrahedral generalisation of the Lambda are demonstrated. There is similar correspondence with the oscillatory form of the superstring. This is because superstring theory is connected to the mathematics of octonions, whose properties are analogous to musical intervals. Remarkable correspondence exists between the 168 permutations of the seven 3-tuples of octonions, the 168 automorphisms of the Klein Quartic, the 168 repetitions of the diatonic intervals of the seven octave species and the superstring structural parameter 168. They indicate that the oscillations performed by superstrings are akin to music played with the notes of the seven musical scales.

I. Ancient Greek musical modes — octave species or keys?

Controversy has persisted to this day over the issue of whether the ancient Greeks classified their different types of music according to keys or to octave species. Did the names Dorian, Phrygian, Lydian, etc. refer to specific keys conferring a distinct moral characteristic, or ethos, or were these qualities of music due to their being played in scales that differed in the ordering of what we would now call their tones and semitones? The former view is the more accepted today. For example, Rita Steblin, the world-renowned musical scholar, states "The ancient
