operations on the environmental resources in Grand Canyon. The preferred alternative (modified low flow) that was selected in the operations EIS (BOR, 1994b) is very similar to the interim flow rules, but some modifications were made as a result of experience with operations during 1993 and 1994, as described below.

Experience with Interim Flows and Exception Criteria

The changes in daily operating rules have had no effect on the ability of the BOR to meet monthly or annual release targets because monthly release targets are totally independent of interim flow rules. It is, however, now much more difficult for the Western Area Power Administration (WAPA) to respond to hourly changes in energy load because of the constraints on both daily and hourly ramping rates (the rate of change in dam releases). Absolute enforcement of the revised operating rules would have decreased WAPA's ability to "meet system regulation needs, maintain transmission reliability, maintain operating reserve requirements, and serve firm load requirements" (WAPA, 1994). Therefore, in October 1991, WAPA and the BOR signed an interagency agreement. This exception criteria agreement allows WAPA to violate flow restriction rules not more than 3 percent of the time in any 30-day period (WAPA, 1994).

The range between the 20,000-cfs maximum and the 5,000-cfs minimum release limits appears to still allow substantial flexibility for response to changes in demand for hydropower. Because of the daily limits on ramping rates, however, the 15,000-cfs nominal range is reduced to 5,000 cfs in months with low-release targets and to 8,000 cfs in high-release months, as indicated in the following EIS preferred alternative section.

A recent example (one week in April 1995) of diurnal variations in both release rates and rates of change in release rates (ramping rates) are given in Figures 4.4 and 4.5. Clearly, the limiting parameter is ramping rate, not the 5,000- to 20,000-cfs bounds on release rate.

EIS Preferred Alternative

Operating criteria for the modified low-fluctuating-flow alternative, which was identified in the final EIS as the preferred alternative, are shown in Table 4.4.
