Development of Three-dimensional DRAGON Grid Technology Yao Zheng, 1999 For a typical three dimensional flow in a practical engineering device the time spent in grid generation can take 70 percent of the total analysis effort resulting in a serious bottleneck in the design analysis cycle The present research attempts to develop a procedure that can considerably reduce the grid generation effort The DRAGON grid as a hybrid grid is created by means of a Direct Replacement of Arbitrary Grid Overlapping by Nonstructured grid The DRAGON grid scheme is an adaptation to the Chimera thinking The Chimera grid is a composite structured grid composing a set of overlapped structured grids which are independently generated and body fitted The grid is of high quality and amenable for efficient solution schemes However the interpolation used in the overlapped region between grids introduces error especially when a sharp gradient region is encountered The DRAGON grid scheme is capable of completely eliminating the interpolation and preserving the conservation property It maximizes the advantages of the Chimera scheme and adapts the strengths of the unstructured grid while at the same time keeping its weaknesses minimal In the present paper we describe the progress towards extending the DRAGON grid technology into three dimensions Essential and programming aspects of the extension and new challenges for the three dimensional cases are addressed
