

Cervantes conferred spiritual and mythic meaning on his hero, and this was intended to express in code the drama of Spain in the Counter Reformation, that desperate conflict between the material and the spiritual. On the one hand, the instant hero is exiled; on the other, he is lifted up to a superhuman sphere. Between this upper spiritual level and the lower strata of everyday life there is another layer, one of intense cultural elaboration, sentimental ideas and of the superior thoughts of everyday life. The level is that of the interpolated tales and episodes; the related material has a greater function than merely complicating the main plot and adding charm to it. This material complicating the main plot, Cervantes' historical actuality as a problematical novelty of style. These episodes add a rich perspective to the Quijote and bring out the hero with an unprecedented novelty of style.

The tale of the Captive Captain clearly shows Cervantes' world and contains the key to the quixotic myth. The vital experience of the author, as reflected in the captive's tale, treacherous baroque anguish. The returning captive is perhaps a young and bold, we are not in the age of Lepanto but in the era of the defeated Armada. The captive is like a spirit from the era of the reintroduces the youth of Cervantes into the environment of his old age. Cervantes' disillusionment corresponds to Spain's decline after Lepanto. Cervantes (as the captive captain) faces his own creation (Don Quijote) deformed by the baroque environment. The hero of Lepanto has artistically been turned into a poor, addled hidalgo who is struggling against the new social order.

2. Ayala, Francisco, "Nota sobre la novelística cervantina," Revista Hispánica Moderna, XXXI (1965), 36-45.

The different approaches to reality in the Quijote are the result of the use of different types of previous genre, all of which looked at the outer world differently. Thus the reverberant baroque nature of the Quijote is due to the inexhaustible combination of traditional styles and to the constant game of vital references to past and present literatures. The tendency in the Quijote is to create, spiritually, spheres that appear to exclude each other. The result is the creation of a new dimension in space.

Cervantes does not turn his back on previous literature. Instead he uses the exhausted prior forms as construction material for his new creation. Endowing with it spiritual spaces whose possibility no one suspected. Don Quijote first appears to belong to the romantic level, since he is a village hidalgo. Soon he becomes part of the chivalric and pastoral worlds. There is, to be sure, an ambiguity at the beginning of the story as to the hero's identity, name, and nature. And this famous Cervantine tendency toward ambiguity, starting with names, gets us lost in a labyrinth of mirrors, through which labyrinth we search for an elusive reality.

23. Ayala, Francisco, "Experiencia viva y creación literaria (un problema del Quijote)," La Torre, núm. 6 (Abril-Junio, 1954), pp. 87-110.

In Luis Zapata's Miscelánea, written prior to Part II of the Quijote, there is an anecdote about a beard-washing prank played on the Portuguese ambassador. This episode appears to have been an historical event, and Cervantes probably heard of it rather than reading it in the Miscelánea. But even if he did read Zapata's work, this would not prevent Cervantes' beard-soaping scene at the palace of the Duques from being true literature. Literary creation concretizes not only the personal experience of the author but the myths of the day as well. The distinction between real-life experience and literary models is, in the last analysis, not at all clear. Cervantes makes his beard-soaping episode more artistic than that of Zapata in several details. More importantly, he causes it to become not something that happened to X and Y but an integral part of his hero's experience and his suffering.

The true transcendence of the Quijote is that it is a new genre. Cervantes manipulates the previous literary molds (from the most lyric to the most crude) in order to multiply perspectives. His new novel, not a loose string of events as in the romance, is an attempt to achieve a total feeling of human existence.
