Nature And Nurture Of Twins:

Twin Study - Nature Or Nurture? Debora Varano, 2013 How much do genes and environment shape our lives These questions can be answered by twin studies With their similar genetic makeup twins represent an ideal opportunity to study the nature nurture debate Since identical twins developed from a single sperm fertilizing a single egg monozygotic these twins are essentially clones Fraternal twins on the other hand are developed when two eggs are separately fertilized by different sperms dizygotic Comparing identical and fraternal twins enables the research to separate the relative importance of genetics from the environmental one If a trait is shared more often by identical twins than fraternal twins it implicates that genetic variance plays an important role in this trait In this research biological factors such as the weight the blood group the blood pressure the hair colour and the eye colour were analyzed Psychological factors such as the intelligence and the handwriting were investigated as well According to the research the variation of the eye color and the hair color are entirely due to genetic variance and barely influenced by environmental factors The body weight the height blood group and the intelligence had a very high heritability of 78 93% The blood pressure and the handwriting were the ones with the lowest heritability 60 64% In general the monozygotic twins showed a higher resemblance in all traits investigated than the dizygotic twins Since almost all of the examined characteristics didn't have a perfect heritability except the hair colour and the eye colour we can assume that both heritability and environmentability are important In conclusion it is the interaction of nature and nurture that shape a characteristic Both of them play a role in determining the variation of a trait However the genetic variance might have a greater influence
