Note of Interest - Codes and Ciphers

The discussion here is about ciphers. Another form of cryptography uses codes which substitute words for words or words for phrases. Codes use some sort of codebook that has the translation between plaintext and code. Encoding is a very powerful form of cryptography and is used with information technology, but is not the primary form of cryptography that we find in commercial products.

Elements of cryptography:

You can probably see that the transposition produces a ciphertext that has the same letters as the plaintext, while the substitution produces a ciphertext that has the same number of letters, but the letters are changed (in this case, to the next letter in the alphabet).

Cryptographic key:

It might seem from this simple example that substitution produces a better ciphertext than transposition, but that is not the case at all. Regardless, the bottom line is that any good encryption method will use both substitution and transposition several times. The methods used in encryption are called cryptographic algorithms. Essentially, a cryptographic algorithm is a series of
