ABSTRACT

Death and dying are less addressed in the undergraduate medical curriculum. These issues are explored during a health/medical humanities module offered to undergraduate medical students. The screening of the movie 'wit' followed by group activities also explores this topic. A study exploring how this topic is addressed in Nepalese medical schools may be required.

Death is inevitable. However, there is still a shortage of medical literature addressing how medical students and doctors should behave and deal with death and regarding their own grieving process during the death of patients.¹ Medicine is intimately connected with the preservation of life and a variety of modern technologies and equipment are available to do the same. Relieving patient suffering, death with dignity and the cost of terminal care are important issues to be considered.² Cost may be an especially important issue in developing nations like Nepal where families mostly pay out of pocket for medical care.³

Death is one of the issues we address during a medical/health humanities module offered to medical and other health science students. It is the last topic to be addressed and is explored during a three-hour session. Among the areas discussed are what is death, what happens after death, whether there is life after death, and what guides us during the moment of death. Many of these areas were traditionally the realm of religion and science is only recently exploring these issues. Different types/ causes of death ranging from cardiac arrest, brain death, and molecular death are addressed in other areas in the curriculum. We also examine how doctors can cope with death, how they can support the family and friends of the dead person, why we fear death, and whether we can learn to accept it.

The five stages of grief by Elizabeth Kubler-Ross are examined. We go into each of the stages in some detail in the session. Changes in death and dying over the last five decades are examined. A major change is that death today is more likely to happen in hospitals surrounded by modern technology. The percentage of death occurring in hospitals was 54% and more in half of the 45 populations during the early twenty-first century in a global study.⁴ Among the elderly in industrialized nations deaths more commonly occur in residential care facilities. We also examine the issue of life after death and the common theories regarding this topic.

The Canadian artist, Robert Pope, who died young of Hodgkin's disease has produced a rich collection of art dealing with cancer, death and dying.⁵ We used his work throughout the module and also in the session on Death and Dying. We end the session with a discussion on how doctors can cope with death and dying. Medical students experienced substantial emotions dealing with patient deaths and coping with the loss.⁷ They felt that
