Women's advancement in the German hospitality industry despite of the glass ceiling Maike Winkler, 2011-09-29 Inhaltsangabe Introduction Today women represent 40 % of the labor force worldwide and continually climb up the hierarchical ladder of organizations However they do not overcome 20 % with regard to higher management levels Interestingly a share of only two to three percent of women is represented in executive management positions within globally relevant corporations This number points out that the lack of females in top levels is a global phenomenon According to Wirth the situation of females in the labor market has enhanced in the last decades However reports of the German Federal Statistical Office show that in 2004 only 1 7 million female workers were holding senior positions in comparison to 3 3 million male workers in the service industry throughout Germany Consequently these figures lead to the assumption that obstacles in terms of the glass ceiling metaphor seem to exist Knutson and Schmidgall characterized a glass ceiling as an invisible generally artificial barrier that prevents qualified individuals such as women from advancing within the organization and reaching their full potential Prior researches indicated that obstacles that result in the glass ceiling effect are linked to
