

Reproductive Coercion by an Intimate Partner: Occurrence, Associations, and Interference with Sexual Health Decision Making

Jonel Thaller and Jill Theresa Messing

Reproductive coercion is a form of intimate partner violence (IPV) in which a variety of tactics can be used to force pregnancy on an intimate partner. This study investigated the occurrence of male-perpetrated reproductive coercion, its relationship to other forms of IPV, and interference with women's sexual health decision making. Two data sets were collected, by conducting client-practitioner screenings ($n = 2,108$) and anonymous surveys ($n = 84$), from women seeking reproductive health services in a southwestern state and analyzed separately. Prevalence and correlates of reproductive coercion varied according to data-collection method, indicating that behaviorally based screening tools and anonymous screening may increase disclosure rates. In the screening sample, reproductive coercion was associated with forced sex, threats of physical harm, and verbal abuse. In the survey sample, reproductive coercion was associated with being nonwhite, fear of asking one's partner to use a condom, and fear of refusing sex. Social workers should be aware that reproductive coercion is a form of coercive control that may be associated with increased fear and IPV and may interfere with sexual health decision making; however, disclosure of reproductive coercion or IPV is not necessary for intervention. The article concludes with a discussion of screening and intervention strategies.

KEY WORDS: domestic violence; family planning; intimate partner violence; reproductive health; screenings Globally, approximately 30 percent of women over the age of 15 have experienced physical or sexual violence from an intimate partner (Devries et al., 2013). Likewise, in the United States, recent estimates indicate that approximately one in three women over the age of 18 have experienced physical or sexual violence or stalking from an intimate partner at some point in their lifetime (Black et al., 2011). IPV results in a multitude of negative physical and mental health consequences, with women reporting injury, chronic fatigue, headaches, gastrointestinal problems, and gynecological problems, as well as depression, suicide or suicidal ideation, shame, and posttraumatic stress disorder (Campbell, 2002; Golding, 1999). In part due to these negative health and mental health consequences, it is likely that social workers—particularly those in health care settings—will come into contact with women who are experiencing IPV. Though studies have found that women are more likely to seek assistance for IPV from friends and family members than formal service providers (Goodkind, Sullivan, & Bybee, 2004; Martin, Houston, Mmari, & Decker, 2012), universal screening can be useful in identifying and intervening in IPV (Thackeray, Stelzner, Downs, & Miller, 2007; Trabold, 2007).

The association between IPV and unintended pregnancy has been well documented (see, for example, Coker, 2007; Gee, Nandita, Wan, Chavkin, & Long, 2009; Miller et al., 2011; Pallitto, Campbell, & O'Campo, 2005; Williams, Larsen, & McCloskey, 2008). However, little is known about the mechanisms underlying this association. Limited control of sexual health decision making appears to be a factor, and recent studies have investigated the prevalence and correlates of reproductive coercion, defined as when a male partner attempts to get his female partner pregnant when she does not want to be (see, for example, Miller et al., 2010; Moore, Frohwirth, & Miller, 2010). This exploratory study reports on data collected through two approaches: (1) a screening conducted by health care providers and (2) a survey conducted by researchers to (a) investigate the occurrence of male-perpetrated reproductive coercion
