SUMMARY

Dental or dentoalveolar traumatic injuries include lesions affecting dental tissues and those affecting the tooth supporting structures. Common causes include fights with other animals, car accidents, falls from a height, blunt trauma and chewing hard materials. The diagnosis is based on clinical and intraoral radiographic examinations. The correct choice of treatment depends on several factors, including patient's age, oral health and general health, extent of the dental damage, timing between trauma and treatment, type of affected tooth, periodontal health of the affected and adjacent teeth, experience of the veterinarian and availability of materials and equipment for advanced treatments. This narrative review of the scientific veterinary literature aims to give guidelines for correct management of dental and periodontal trauma in dogs and cats.

INTRODUCTION

Dental or dento-alveolar traumatic lesions include lesions affecting the tooth tissues (enamel, dentin, cement and dental pulp - dental trauma) and lesions to support structures (gingiva, periodontal ligament and alveolar bone, as well as to the root cement - periodontal traumas).^{1,2} The prevalence in dogs and cats is quite high.^{3,4} Although they often cause a certain degree of pain, this trauma (especially dental fractures) is often accompanied by non-specific and / or hardly recognizable symptoms.^{3,4} Furthermore, it is often underestimated because any clinically recognizable complications develop after the event, traumatic. However, traumatic injuries can lead to periodontal and / or endodontic compromise of dental elements and must therefore be diagnosed and treated appropriately.^{1,2}

This narrative review of the literature was undertaken with the purpose to provide a systematic approach to the diagnosis and treatment of dental and periodontal trauma in dogs and cats.
