

PAPERS SCHEDULED FOR PUBLICATION, 2015–2016

At publication of this Research Results Digest, final versions of papers submitted in September 2016 have been reviewed and accepted for publication in Transportation Research Record, No. 2603. Papers are now undergoing final edits and will be published in early 2017. The following copy presents abstracts for the candidate papers. For each paper, the names that follow the lead (student) author represent the student's advisers and others who made specific contributions to the paper.

1. Enhancing Safety Risk Management with Quantitative Measures

Boris Claros, Carlos Sun, and Praveen Edara

Abstract. The airfield in hub airports is a place where a large number of activities occur involving a wide range of participants. These participants include aircraft that can carry hundreds of passengers, ground vehicles, and workers. The Safety Management System (SMS) is the FAA's approach to systematically manage aviation safety. A major component of SMS is Safety Risk Management (SRM), which entails the analysis, assessment, and control of safety risks, including risks on the airfield. The current SRM has few specific safety models to estimate likelihood or frequency of risks. This paper presents an example for the development and incorporation of safety models into the SRM. Specifically, safety models for runway incursion are discussed which utilize the variables of total and general aviation operations, length of runway by type (single, parallel, crossing, or mixed), number of taxiway intersections, snow-fall, precipitation, number of hotspots, and construction activity. The categorization and processing of data was significant because each variable used could take on multiple forms (e.g., the runway system can be quantified in many ways), and some types of data involved the review of airfield diagrams. The data used were from 137 hub airports from the U.S. for the years 2009 to 2014. For modeling, the negative multinomial distribution was used because it was found suitable for representing overdispersed data such as runway incursion frequency. The performance of the models was assessed using the goodness-of-fit measures of log-likelihood, overdispersion, and cumulative residual plots. The models were developed for different runway incursion severity categories (A, B, C, D, and total) and type of surface events (operational incident [OI], pilot deviation [PD], and vehicle pedestrian deviation [VPD]). The safety modeling approach presented in this paper can serve as a foundation for the development of other safety models that can be integrated into the SRM to enable the quantitative analysis of safety risks.

2. Data-Driven Ground Delay Program Planning

Alexander Estes and Michael Ball

Abstract. We provide a model-based approach to planning ground delay programs. Previous research on automated planning of ground delay programs has involved the use of mathematical programming techniques. We propose a data-driven method that models the problem of choosing a traffic management initiative using the multi-armed bandit decision problem framework. This approach makes more complete use of the available data, and suggestions made by this procedure can be shown along with data that informed the decision. This allows decision makers to more easily evaluate suggested decisions. We provide simulations of our procedure based on data from Newark International Airport to evaluate its effectiveness.

3. Representative Weather Profiles in Airport Planning

Sneeta Gorripaty and Mark Hansen

Abstract. Given the expensive and protracted nature of airport improvement projects, it is important to plan them using careful forecasting and reliable estimates of demand and capacity. The processes aimed at improving airports and satisfying the time and financial constraints constitute airport planning. In airport planning, when considering the limitations of an airport and potential improvements, one needs to consider the daily capacity variations due to local weather and how those compare with the airport's demand profile. The current representation of capacity in the planning process does not capture this variation and dependence on local weather. A weather profile of a given day is defined as a series of weather conditions observed or predicted for every
