when Rachel puts her own name forward he can't help but wonder what her agenda is. But it's her conditions that have him rolling his eyes. It's only when she arrives in Ireland that Rachel turns the Earl's life upside down. She starts solving problems he didn't even know he had. The biggest problem is they're starting to fall for one another. But it's a business arrangement and she's going home in three months. Different backgrounds. Different personalities. Different ideas about how things should be done. Opposites attract but can they find common ground? Her Irish Inheritance. Two broken hearts and one dilapidated property that might just bring them together. Nothing is going right for Caroline Egan. Her partner has left her and she's lost her job. The only thing that remains is a piece of property three thousand miles away. Her plan is to sell the place and use the money to move on with her life. But the house needs some work and she ends up staying in Ireland much longer than she anticipated. Soon she's torn between the plans she has for her life and her growing attraction for both the property and the carpenter fixing it up. Patrick Kelly is all too familiar with loss. A widowed dad he's trying to raise his young daughters as best as he can. When he lands work at a nearby cottage he's grateful until he discovers who the new owner is. But as time goes on, Patrick begins to wonder if Caroline holds the key to him moving on with his life. Both cannot deny their attraction for one another. Both are cautious. There's an ocean between them as well as hearts that have been broken in the past. Can they overcome insurmountable odds for a chance at happiness?
