New Logs of a Pasture Pilot

Gordon Baxter

IN THE AUTUMN OF 1979 I met an old friend at the airport coffee shop. Even holding his cup with both hands, it still clattered when he set it down on the table top. His eyes still held some of the fear of whatever it was he had just seen.

"You want to tell me about it?" I asked, easing in across the table from him with my own cup of coffee.

"Yes, but only if you write it so that the names and places could never be traced, because I know you, and I know this is a story for the magazine."

So none of the names or numbers in this story are real except the common numbers having to do with navigation. The story is how Claymer Klutz, an experienced lightplane pilot, nearly got into a midair with a Boeing 727 while both were on approach and both were under radar control and both were talking to Approach Control and it was still daylight VFR. It would have been another of those mysterious tragedies the press would have had a field day with.

Klutz is a commercial pilot, instrument- and multi-rated. Statistically, he qualifies for and gets the best insurance rates. Personally, he still likes flying, though he's been a pilot for years.
