Abstract: The perception that teachers have of cultural diversity is essential when it comes to the educational attention given to immigrant students. The objective is to determine how teachers perceive students' cultural diversity and families' commitment with the education of their children, and if this perception can influence teachers' expectations regarding students and their families. This is qualitative research study based on hermeneutic phenomenology developed through semi-structured interviews, applied on an intentional sample of 16 Spanish primary school teachers. The results indicate that teachers need the assistance of educational specialists, training in cultural diversity, and intercultural communication skills. They also recognize the importance of enhancing collaboration with immigrant families. Hence, education must be rethought, bearing in mind the perceptions of teachers, empowering students and their families with new innovative formulas aimed at incorporating their cultural references in the curriculum, and providing culturally relevant teaching.

1. Introduction

Present-day society, and more specifically the educational system, requires a change that accommodates all students, in which there is no exclusion and where diversity is understood not as a problem but as a learning opportunity [1–5]. This learning allows both immigrant and autochthonous students to enrich their culture by exchanging and incorporating new cultural elements, values, and attitudes while eliminating prejudices and encouraging situations of intercultural coexistence [6–10]. For this to be successful, not only does it depend on the teachers and students, but the participation of their families is also paramount [11,12]. On certain occasions, the perceptions of teachers towards immigrant students and immigrant families' perceptions of education become an obstacle. Therefore, we have set ourselves the objective of determining how centres, and more specifically teachers, perceive the cultural diversity of the students in their classrooms, and if this perception can influence the expectations of the teaching staff regarding immigrant students, and in the case of immigrant families, if the teachers perceive them as facilitators who are committed to the education of their children. This research can help fight inequality and injustice in the education field. It is exactly related to sustainable development objectives 4 and 10, since we intend to improve teacher training to guarantee inclusive, equitable, and quality education and promote learning opportunities, in addition to reducing educational inequalities of the most vulnerable populations, in this case immigrant students and their families in Spanish schools.

In a study, it was concluded that teachers' expectations influence student achievement, and these expectations were different depending on the student's ethnic group [13]. In another study with Latino students residing in the USA, it was evident that the teachers perceived the students' use of their mother tongue to communicate with one another

Allouche-Benayoun, 2012-11-08 The way people think about the Holocaust is changing The particular nature of the transformation depends on people s historical perspectives and how they position themselves and their nation or community vis vis the tragedy Understandably European Muslims perceive the Holocaust as less central to their history than do other Europeans Yet while the acknowledgement and commemoration of the horrors of the Holocaust are increasingly important in Europe Holocaust denial and biased views on the Holocaust are widespread in European Muslims countries of origin In this book a number of distinguished scholars and educators of various backgrounds discuss views of the Holocaust Problematic views are often influenced by a persistent attitude of Holocaust denial which is derived in part from discourses in the Muslim communities in their countries of origin The essays collected here explore the backgrounds of these perceptions and highlight positive approaches and developments Many of the contributions were written by people working in the field and reflecting on their experiences This collection also reveals that problematic views of the Holocaust are not limited to Muslim communities
