

Insects' perception and behavioral responses to plant semiochemicals

Diriba Fufa Serdo

Department of Biology, Ambo University, Ambo, Ethiopia

ABSTRACT

Insect-plant interactions are shaped by the exchange of chemical cues called semiochemicals, which play a vital role in communication between organisms. Plants release a variety of volatile organic compounds in response to environmental cues, such as herbivore attacks. These compounds play a crucial role in mediating the interactions between plants and insects. This review provides an in-depth analysis of plant semiochemicals, encompassing their classification, current understanding of extraction, identification, and characterization using various analytical techniques, including gas chromatography-mass spectrometry (GC-MS), liquid chromatography-mass spectrometry (LC-MS), nuclear magnetic resonance (NMR) spectroscopy, and infrared (IR) spectroscopy. The article also delves into the manner in which insects perceive and respond to plant semiochemicals, as well as the impact of environmental factors on plant odor emission and insect orientation. Furthermore, it explores the underlying mechanisms by which insects perceive and interpret these chemical cues, and how this impacts their behavioral responses, including feeding habits, oviposition patterns, and mating behaviors. Additionally, the potential applications of plant semiochemicals in integrated pest management strategies are explored. This review provides insight into the intricate relationships between plants and insects mediated by semiochemicals, highlighting the significance of continued research in this field to better understand and leverage these interactions for effective pest control.

INTRODUCTION

Plants and insects have evolved to interact with one another in complex and fascinating ways. Insect-plant interactions are shaped by the exchange of chemical cues called semiochemicals, which play a vital role in communication between organisms. A key aspect of this interaction is the use of chemical cues, both by plants to attract beneficial insects and deter pests, and by insects to locate and evaluate potential food sources (Prasath, 2022). The term semiochemical is derived from the Greek word "semeion", meaning a signal, and these substances vary in their molecular weights based on their carbon chain (Seroker, Humari & Faleiro, 2015). Semiochemicals are chemicals or mixtures released by an organism that carry messages and influence the behaviors of other organisms (Mwercsa et al., 2020). These chemical signals play a crucial role in various biological processes, such as plant-insect interactions, insect-microbe interactions, and insect-insect interactions.
