

Diagnosis of acute periodontal lesions

ESMONDE F. CORBET

A thorough understanding of the interpretation of the findings from a clinical and a radiographic examination of dental and periodontal tissues still forms the basis for the initial diagnosis and often for establishing the definitive diagnosis of most acute periodontal lesions. Components of the complete clinical periodontal examination are covered in detail by Armitage (5). Imaging methods in periodontics are covered by Mol (65). Only those aspects particular to the clinical and radiographic examinations in the diagnosis of acute periodontal lesions are covered in this chapter. Microbial testing, as outlined by Loomer (56), is principally confined to testing in chronic periodontal disease conditions, and microbial testing plays little part in the diagnosis of most acute periodontal lesions, although they are infective in origin. The diagnosis of the common acute periodontal lesions can still be established, for the most part, on the basis of the clinical and radiographic examination.

Acute periodontal lesions and gingival ulcerations may of course occur in patients with systemic diseases, and the testing of patients for systemic disease is covered by Mariotti (59). Localized tooth-related factors that predispose to periodontal infections, including acute purulent infections, are covered by Matthews & Tabesh (60). Combined periodontal-endodontic lesions may present as acute purulent lesions. The diagnosis of these combined periodontal-endodontic lesions is covered by Rotstein & Simon (75). The diagnosis of periodontal manifestations of systemic disease, which may include both acute periodontal lesions and more evidently, gingival ulcerations, are covered by Jordan (46).

This chapter aims to cover those aspects of the diagnostic aspects applied in the diagnosis of acute periodontal lesions not covered in other chapters of this volume, to which readers are referred for a more complete background to comprehensive periodontal diagnosis. This chapter aims to cover establishing a diagnosis of acute periodontal lesions. 'Acute' when used to describe a periodontal condition is taken to mean rising to its crisis (i.e. its worst point) sharply and having a short and relatively dramatic course in the acute phase before the crisis is reached.

The two acute periodontal conditions are necrotizing periodontal disease and acute periodontal abscess, and the diagnosis of these is considered. Whether differentiating acute necrotizing ulcerative gingivitis from acute necrotizing ulcerative periodontitis in the healthy patient has any practical implications is discussed, as is necrotizing periodontal disease and HIV infection. A common differential diagnosis for acute necrotizing gingivitis, often given in periodontal textbooks, is acute herpetic gingivostomatitis. The question is asked if it is reasonable to misdiagnose necrotizing ulcerative gingivitis for acute herpetic gingivostomatitis. Furthermore, other conditions that a practitioner should consider when faced with a patient presenting with acute ulcerations of the gingiva are given attention.

Acute abscesses of the periodontium, which are not endodontic in origin, must be differentiated from those that are endodontic in origin for practitioners to be able with reasonable certainty to establish a diagnosis and institute appropriate therapy. As the American Academy of Periodontology's Parameter on Acute Periodontal Diseases (3) argues, failure to treat acute periodontal diseases appropriately is what may result in progressive loss of periodontal attachment possibly affecting an adverse change in prognosis and possible tooth loss. For the periodontal practitioner the first step towards appropriate therapy of acute periodontal lesions is a sound diagnosis. A very useful guiding principle for practitioners is that acute periodontal lesions usually respond dramatically to appropriate 'emergency' periodontal therapy; if the emergency therapy has been optimal, yet the response has not been rapid, then a diagnosis other than an acute periodontal lesion should be sought.
